FTC To Prescribe Better Labeling For Furniture

Better labeling for furniture, to protect the consumer, is in the offing. According to Changing Times, the Kiplinger Magazine, after nearly three years of debating the fine points with members of the industry and with consumer representatives, the Federal Trade Commission is about to come out with rules that will make life easier for the furniture buyer.

The new rules will outlaw any misrepresentations of furniture woods, including indirect misrepresentation resulting from failure to disclose pertinent facts. Truthful descriptions must be on all tags and labels and in advertisements. Specifically, the rules provide:

The wood used for exposed surfaces must be labeled by its true name. Examples of false claims would be describing as "maple" a captain's chair made of birch; using the term "solid mahogany" or "mahogany" to describe a mahogany-veneered table; describing a walnut-stained hackberry chair as "Danish-style walnut"; or describing any nonumber product such as hardboard, fiberboard, metal, plastic, etc., as wood. (The term, "mahogany-grained hardboard," to describe a simulated finish on a wood imitation would be accurate.)

Ads may not contain half-truths tending to mislead. For example, a manufacturer must not describe as "maple" a table that consists of maple top with pecan legs; he must use the more accurate label "maple top-pecan legs." Similarly, even a true mahogany veneer but with a finish printed to resemble crotch mahogany must reveal this bit of imitation.

The word "walnut" can refer only to woods of the genus Juglans. Philippine mahogany and African mahogany refer to woods from different trees, but both are legal designations.

But even when the new labels become universal, the magazine points out, it will still be up to the buyer to understand what he is reading—and the wise consumer will study the vocabulary before he goes shopping.

Breeding Of Cats Discouraged

The best advice about breeding cats is DON'T. Experts estimate that there are more than 25,000,000 cats in America and many of them are homeless. The city pounds and humane organizations in this country are flooded with kittens and cats that no one wants. Hundreds of thousands of kittens and cats must be mercifully killed every year to keep them from slow starvation and cruel death from disease and exposure.

Your humane society recommends that all cats kept as pets be neutered—females spayed, males castrated. Neutered cats often make the better pets. Castrated males lose their otherwise strong tendency to roam, fight, spray the furniture and stay out all night. Spayed females do not afflict you with periodic "heat" periods. A cat may be neutered any time after six months of age.
