Habit is defined by Webster as "an aptitude or inclination acquired by repetition". Habits, as all other things, may be either good or bad, friend or enemy.

Many habits are considered friends. These include punctuality, neatness, and politeness. Punctuality is the habit of being prompt or at a designated place at an appointed time.

Politeness is another habit which people obtain by practice and use. You may read all you wish about etiquette and proper manners, but you can't be polite without practicing the habit of common decency each and every day.

Other habits are often considered enemies. These include smoking, drinking, and eating in excess. Smoking often starts out as a method of gaining prestige for the teenage crowd.

Excessive eating can also be an enemy. Often people eat in excess and gain weight exorbitantly. This excess weight places extra strain on the heart and often starts heart ailments and causes death.
