Allegany County Civil Defense

Robert L. Coulter, Director

Allegany County Civil Defense are pleased with the test conducted Friday. The test showed that the "Go to your nearest shelter" program was again successful in its tryout.

The problems theoretically handled were similar to those which would be acted upon in the event of a natural disaster. This second part of Civil Defense has occurred fortunately only a few times in Allegany County and then on a limited scale. Many of the actions taken by the administrative staff during the operation were similar to those undertaken by Alaskan Civil Defense in the recent earthquake. These comprised problems of welfare feeding and housing, rehabilitation and resumption of normal activities.

Civil Defense staff administrators found some things which did not function smoothly, however, their comments were that such occurrences showed the unexpected things which would happen in any real emergency and this allowed for planning to avoid these contingencies. To the staff, local deputy directors and plant protection unit chiefs the test conducted Friday, May 15th reaffirmed the thinking that the program "Go to your nearest shelter" is workable and that communications facilities, while not satisfactory, are improved.

The test was basically formulated on the "after attack" period and the problems which would ensue. While consideration was given for radiological problems still existent, the condition was quite similar to a natural disaster such as the Alaskan earthquake, and would have evolved into problems of welfare care, relocations of people, a study of manpower requirements, and efforts to re-establish industrial production as well as governmental functions.

It was estimated that food supplies would have been sufficient for ten days. However many problems could have arisen as to the proper distribution of food after the ten day period.

It was felt by the County and Alternate Directors that this test was successful although primarily so in that it showed the extremely difficult problems which would arise and the shortcomings of preparedness.

It was obvious from the actions and the results that there is a shortage of trained Civil Defense personnel, a definite lack on the part of the individual citizen and business of knowledge of what could happen and what to do.

It appears that your County Civil Defense organization has

Film Available On Camp Equipment

A new film, "Introduction to Forest Adventuring", is available free on request from the State University College of Forestry. The 27-minute sound and color movie was produced by Dr. William M. Harlow, a professor of wood technology at the college. He is a contributor to Walt Disney's "True Life Adventure Series" and a collaborator/producer of "Encyclopedia Britannica Films".

Produced with the novice camper in mind, "Forest Adventuring" is an excellent film for instructing adult groups, Boy Scouts, junior conservation clubs and others in the proper handling of camp equipment. It covers such basic skills as safe fire building, compass and map use, axe handling, and water safety. The film is a visual companion to "When You Are in the Woods", a popular booklet by Prof. Fay Welch, also available free of charge from the college.

"Forest Adventuring" is one of 85 films available for viewing by New York State groups. To learn more about this and other films, write for a copy of "Free Films on Forest Conservation," from the Extension Division, State University College of Forestry, Syracuse, N. Y. 13210.
