LIVING UNDER LAW CRIMINAL AND CIVIL-LAW When two cars crash, for instance, two kinds of law may sometimes come into play. One is criminal and the other civil law. Under criminal law, the district attorney or the judge looks into the accident and may decide that one or both parties broke a traffic law. It must be proved beyond all reasonable doubt that one or both drivers broke a certain law. If the court finds that the prosecutor did not prove the crime beyond a reasonable doubt then the state will lose its case. The accused will go free. "Criminal negligence" is no defense to a criminal action. Civil Action Explained That second kind of action that may grow out of an accident, for example, is a civil action. Anyone hurt in the crash may sue the driver or owner of the other car asking for money damages. In a civil action you have merely to show by a "preponderance" of the evidence, that the other party caused the accident. You as "plaintiff" do not have to prove your case beyond all reasonable doubt. Moreover, in a civil case, unlike the criminal case, contributory negligence is a good defense. Let the "defendant" show that the plaintiff's own negligent acts helped to cause the accident and the "plaintiff" will lose his case. So a person can be held criminally liable, and yet defeat a civil suit where the defense of contributory negligence is available to him. Or, one may be held liable in a civil action and yet found not guilty in a criminal action. Burden of proof needed for a criminal conviction, or because not every case giving rise to liability in a civil action is made a crime.
