New Vegetable Varieties Offered For Home Gardens

Home gardeners will soon be making lists of vegetable seeds and plants they intend to buy. Here are suggestions on varieties, mostly new, from Prof. Philip A. Mingos, vegetable crops specialist, N. Y. State College of Agriculture at Cornell.

Tomato varieties, resistant to both Verticillium and Fusarium Wilts, are now available. Verticillium wilt is sometimes a problem in soils where tomatoes, potatoes, and strawberries have been grown over a number of years. Fusarium wilt is a problem in warmer climates, such as on Long Island.

Galaxy, an early producer, is resistant to Verticillium. Heinz 1350 a later variety, resists both wilts and is good for canning and eating. Try these tomato varieties where the garden has been in the same spot many years.

Fantastic is a good, fairly early hybrid tomato but is not wilt resistant. Tom Tom, a large, wilt-resistant hybrid, is similar to Big Boy which has large fruits. Gardner and Fireball, older varieties, are still recommended for early ripening though neither is wilt resistant.

Lettuce — Buttercrunch and Summer Bibb, for early spring and fall plantings, are excellent for tossed salads.

Peppers — Lincoln Bell, Delaware Belle, and Staddon's Select are bell types and the latter two are resistant to tobacco mosaic. Pennwonder is a standard, popular variety, still recommended.

Sweet Corn — Seneca Explorer, a very early variety, is worth testing. Spring Gold is fairly early. Maturing slightly later are Honey and Cream or Better and Sugar with their yellow and white, tender, sweet kernels.

Later varieties recommended are Gold Cup, Seneca Chief, and Wonderful Silver Queen, a white kernel corn, is of high quality.

Snap Beans — Tendercrop remains one of the best eating of the green varieties. Tenderette is a new, white seeded tendercrop. Bush Blu Lake, with distinctive flavor, is later than Tendercrop, but may not be available this year because of lack of seed.

Two yellow wax beans include Kinghorn Wax and Eastern Butter-wax.

Peas — Some of the smaller-podded varieties like Freezonian, Perfected Freezer 60, and Frosty yield a higher percentage of shelled peas per pound of pods than the common large-podded varieties. For those preferring the larger pods, Greater Progress is suggested.

Muskmelons — Two new varieties are Saticoy Hybrid which is very sweet, and Maine Rock.

Broccoli — The new Primo Hybrid looks good. Waltham 29 is the main, standard variety.

Beets — King Red, Royal Red,
