The Class of 1965 has taken its Senior Trip. We saw New York City. We saw the World's Fair. We suffered aching feet, cold wind and rain. We lost sleep. We are still moving with our eyes half open. Was the trip worth the "misery"? It surely was!

to observe at a distance without all the noise and confusion.

The Pepsi-Cola Exhibit was something I shall long remember. The theme "It's A Small World" was carried out with dolls representing all the children of the world.

Of course, I was impressed with the largeness of New York and the World's Fair, but one thing I didn't like was the feeling of always being rushed and in a hurry.

Another exhibit which was particularly interesting was the Ford Exhibit where we were put into beautiful 1965 Ford automobiles and transported through a very life-like portrayal of man and his development from the earliest days up to the present day. The craftsmanship was really amazing. Although there were some things about New York City that were strange and almost frightening there was still something about it that made me wish that I could go back again someday soon.

as far as the living conditions are concerned.

Probably the most educational part of our trip was the tour through the United Nations. From our guide we received detailed information on such components as the Security Council and General Assembly.

The location of our hotel was also very interesting. Hotel Manhattan is located just off Broadway. On our block there were such musicals as "Golden Boy" starring Sammy Davis, Jr.; "Hell Dolly", starring Carol Channing, and Victor Borge was also starring in a performance.

Returning visitors from New York City always try to impress people with the fact that the people in the city are rude, crude and dirty. Actually, the opposite is true. The people there are just like the people in Andover. They for the most part are friendly and polite. Some people feel the city is beautiful, and as a matter of fact it is, at night. In the daytime however, it looks like only old set of buildings.

Of course, everything was wonderful at the Fair, but the one exhibit that impressed me the most was the Illinois Pavilion. There they had wax replica of Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln was real—from blinking his eyes to moving his head and hands. He acted and looked like a real human. This life-like replica of Mr. Lincoln impressed me the most of all the things I saw.

The one thing I regret is that we didn't stay longer. We were just learning our way around the city by Sunday morning. There was so much more I would like to have seen. I would also like to have spent more time at the places we did visit.

The exhibits that impressed me most were the Illinois and Coca-Cola pavilions. Illinois has a figure (it can't be called a statue) of Abraham Lincoln that has such life-like movements, it is fantastic. Coca-Cola has scenes from places around the world, complete with aromas and spongy carpeting for jungle floors.

In all, the city and the Fair were very nice. The only things which I didn't like were the food and the prices!

Senior Trip

The following paragraphs are excerpts from compositions written by the Seniors about their trip to New York and the Fair:

The city of New York is a very cold, noisy, impersonal place. Even though I saw many strange sights on the city streets I was fascinated by all the "men in the gray flannel suits". I'm glad I am not one of them because they seem so mechanical and robot-like.

The U.N. made me feel humble and proud at the same time. I felt very small when I realized that the rooms I was in had been the places where many great decisions involving the entire world has been named.

The top of the Empire State Building was one of my favorite places because I could watch the hustle and bustle of the city without having to be a part of it. This was the only beautiful aspect of New York City to me.

After being in the city for only a short time, the trip to the United Nations was a welcome relief. New York isn't a very clean city but the United Nations is something else. It's so clean and pleasant that you can hardly believe it has any connection with the city itself. Technically it doesn't, because the land the buildings are built on, belongs to all participating nations. Inside the main entrance there is an exact duplicate of the first Russian Sputnik and a very complicated explaining of how the world was first known to be round. The explanation consisted of a brass ball on the end of a cable, like a pendulum. Perhaps the most significant part of the United Nations is the worldly atmosphere. It was quite odd to actually walk and sit in the same places the leaders of the world do when they congregate to discuss the fate of nations.

I was most impressed with the House of Japan, that was where I ate dinner my last night at the Fair. The House of Japan was quite large, with the main room up stairs. We went into this room with a higher platform, above the floor, and we were asked to remove our shoes. We sat at a very small table, which was about six inches from the floor! I sat on three pillows, with my legs crossed, which wasn't at all easy.

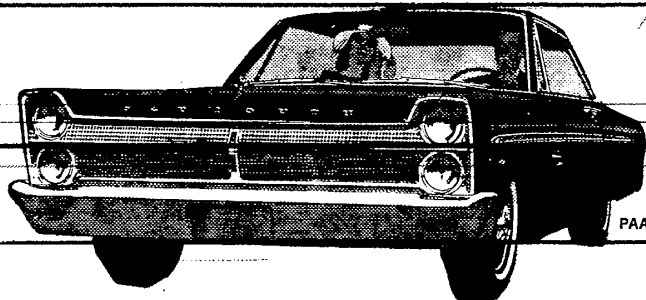

We were waited on by several Japanese girls in long brocade kimonos. They brought in the different courses, which were to be eaten with chop sticks, which I did not attempt. We had every thing from soup to rice, our main course was chicken fried in soy sauce. After dinner we had our tea. It was a new experience eating Japanese food for the very first time.

The one thing that interested me the most in New York City was the people. It is very hard to imagine that there could be so many different kinds of people in the city. Everyone in that city was minding his own business and not worrying about the next person. At two o'clock in the morning, the streets were still filled with people. This, I could hardly believe.

The most fascinating thing at the Fair in my mind was the General Motors Building. Here a person would be taken for a ride in a set of seats going around the inside of the building. It was dark because it was necessary to show the people what they were trying to do. First, you went through outer space on a tour inside the dark building, and as you were riding along, on each side of when the moon would be like when you, would be life-like scene of you go there in a few years for a vacation.

Next you were taken to the ocean depths also with scenes on each side of you and what it would be like in future years down there
