LIVING UNDER LAW

DEFENDING THE UNDERDOG

Within hours after Lee Harvey Oswald's arrest in Dallas, the president of the local bar
association
went to his jail
cell to offer
legal assistance. At that moment, Oswald was probably the most hated man in the country. Yet he was certainly entitled to whatever protection was guaranteed him by the laws of the land.

And so is every man, however unpopular he may be.
The offer of legal help to Oswald was in a tradition that goes back to the nation's earliest days, when John Adams defended the British soldiers who took part in the Boston Massacre.

Nonetheless, it is often true that an unpopular defendant does face special difficulties in finding an attorney to represent him. The problem arises most frequently in cases involving civil rights, heinous crimes, repugnant personalities, or touchy politics — either on the left or right.

Why are many lawyers reluctant to take such cases? No doubt one reason is the personal aversion they may feel to the character or ideas of the defendant.

But a more basic reason is the very real danger of "guilt by association". All too quickly people jump to the conclusion that a lawyer and his client are birds of a feather.

No other profession is similarly afflicted. People ascribe no wrong to the minister who gives a thief comfort or to the doctor who removes a thief's appendix. But they often take it for granted that the lawyer of a thief, if not actually dishonest himself, is at least inclined in that direction.

What they forget is the nature of a lawyer's function.
His task is not to judge his client. His task is to present his client's side of the argument as convincingly as he can — while the prosecutor does the same for the opposing side.

A famous lawyer was once reproached for defending anarchists. He replied: "I do not defend anarchy, I defend the Constitution".
