Montauk For Winter Fishing

Word that cod are close in to Montauk, is one of those annual news flashes that anglers pass on to one another about as fast as if it were coming live via satellite. To make sure, I called Capt. Paul Forsberg, who pilots the Viking Starlite out of Montauk, and he assured me plenty of cod were around.

"They're right in our backyard. 30 minutes from the dock. We are also picking up plenty of cod from south of Block Island."

This was enough to send me packing, with ice chest and plenty of warm clothes, on my yearly trip to Montauk for some fast party boat fishing. This is the quiet time of year for the tip of Long Island but hardy fishermen keep coming and boats operated all winter long.

Party boat professionals seem to like to fish from the stern, and rods were already tied there indicating those spots were taken when I boarded the Starlite at 5 a. m. I checked a boat rod out from the mate, and tied it along the side just by the cabin door — if I couldn't fish from the stern I would stand inside and warm up occasionally. As we reached the fishing grounds I baited up the two hoops with skimmer clams.

The anchor had hardly caught when one of the fishermen yelled for the gaff, the first fish was on!

With eight ounces of lead on your line, and the deck pitching beneath your feet like a bucking bronco it's not easy to tell when you have a hit. My tactic was simply to let the clams lie on or near bottom and wait for a greedy cod to swallow them.

After losing a few baits, the sharp tugs of a fish were unmistakable. Reeling in, I discovered my first catch of the day was a blackfish. The mate gaffed him and I dropped him in my plastic bag. While I expected a codfish a big black is always welcome. This started a flurry of activity for me, and I caught several cod within an hour—one a 20-pounder that almost won the boat pool.

Quite a number of blackfish were caught during the day, so that everybody had a mixed bag of fish. As we pulled into dock, the usual cluster of onlookers was there to check the catch and to buy fish from the mates.

Several of us cleaned our fish at the dock, and I iced my catch in the chests. It had been another successful winter day at Montauk.

According to a survey by the State Conservation Department, 57 percent of the people who buy big game hunting licenses come from rural areas that support only 19 percent of the State's population. The remaining 81 percent of the total New York population reside in urban areas and supply 43 percent of our deer and bear hunters.

WHY NOT NIBBLE?

Do you nibble, or do you still eat the standard three meals a day? It could be that most people would answer that question by saying, they nibble — meaning that they do indulge in some between-meal eating.

But a true nibbler is one who eats smaller meals and eats, say, five or six times a day. This is the pattern that some nutritionists are recommending.

Research Findings

Research at the University of Illinois and elsewhere indicates that nibbling makes energy available to the body in amounts that can be used up. Meal eating, by comparison, can give the body more than it needs at that particular time, encouraging the body to store energy for future needs in the form of fat. Thus weight is added to the body.

Nibbling, like the schools of new economics and new politics, offers a change. And presumably, if you don't eat too much food each day in total, nibbling can offer an even environment of "feeling good" rather than "feeling full" and weight control.

Early man, experts point out, could get along on less frequent but larger meals. Early man's physical activity (sometimes just in finding his food) was much greater. But today, our energy requirements are less and, most of all, food's availability is almost endless.

We might take advantage of the very fact of availability and eat less but more often. After all, wherever you are, one does not have far to go to obtain food. Trouble is, a lot of people have allowed food's availability to make them gluttons. It's time for them to change.

Work habits, too, favor more nibbling. Coffee breaks, for example: These moments should contribute to your daily food intake of a variety of nourishing foods. They should not simply be an excuse for a stimulant. A restaurant that serves coffee also offers salads, glasses of milk, cottage cheese and crackers, or delicious bowls of soup, or milk shakes. Even food vending machines offer snacks that can be counted as part of the food you should have during the day.

Also At Home

At home on weekends, or for the homemaker and children every day, you could easily eat more often and choose foods that are from the milk group, the meat-fish-poultry-egg group, fruits and vegetables, and breads and cereals. Also, in watching how much you eat figure those hor d'ouvers at a neighbor's party as one of your small meals.

Happy nibbling!
