LIVING UNDER LAW

EMPTY BUTCHER SHOP

Entering into a business of your own, either in your spare time or

on a full-time basis, is a big step. Careful consideration should be given every part of such a venture.

One man, John, did not bother to find out what his rights were, and he lived to regret it.

While in the military service, John learned the butcher trade. Upon returning to civilian life, he decided to open his own shop. After looking around, John learned of a small meat shop in a good neighborhood that was for sale.

The shop was doing a thriving business and seemed to have a substantial number of regular customers. The owner, Amos Jones, showed John the books and they indicated a good return. This appeared to be just the opportunity that he had been looking for — so John bought the shop.

Business went on briskly for about two weeks, just long enough for Amos to open another butcher shop right around the corner. All of Amos' customers followed him to his new shop. John, a newcomer to the town, saw his trade almost vanish. Yet, he could do nothing.

John might have prevented this situation from arising.
He could have put a clause into the contract of sale prohibiting Amos from opening another butcher shop within a given area around his old shop, or perhaps even in the same town. This clause also could have provided against Amos' returning to the operation of a meat market for a reasonable length of time.

It's a good idea to consult your lawyer before entering into any kind of business transaction.
