Fishing Tactics Change

For the first time in my life there was no off-season this winter. Ted Kochanek and I took our last ice fishing jaunt as the first day of spring loomed on the horizon, leaving us barely enough time to get our gear in order for the trout opener. It's pretty good timing when you can step directly from your snowmobile into waders. As we change tactics, drifting worms and spinners in cloudy currents and under root-bound banks, we'll remember the days of fun we had on the ice. Our trips this winter were made possible by a Ski-Doo, and they are as useful to fishermen as a boat.

We had sunshine on our last trip to Sandy Pond off Lake Ontario, and when the perch slowed down we dozed in the first warmth of spring. Never-the-less, we caught a batch and a dinner of tender fillets capped a day to remember.

Other trips to Lake Erie, where our quarry was also perch; Oneida Lake for excellent walleye fishing; Sackett's Harbor where pike were taking large minnows, Opeah, Ontario, where we fished small lakes for brook trout and lakers; and Bradley Brook Reservoir, in Madison County, where we caught a brown trout and two rainbows.

We had fair days and foul, days when we caught fish and days when we didn't but every one was a good one. The Ski-Doo kept us outdoors all winter, and we enjoyed every minute of it.

Looking back on the season, there are a few conclusions that can be made while they're fresh.

Generally, it seems winter fishing is as good or better than summer fishing. This may be due to the fact that only the dedicated anglers are out in a blizzard — but whatever, they do catch a lot of fish.

The Conservation Department is encouraging winter angling by allowing trout fishing in selected lakes. One can assume they might broaden this policy if ice fishermen learn how to take trout through the ice and it becomes popular. It should never include waters where natural reproduction occurs, however.

Regarding snowmobiles, drivers seem to be no more courteous than motor boat operators. This isn't saying much, for you take your life in your hands to venture out on some of our lakes. Certain regulations would improve the situation, and both snowmobile owners and manufacturers have supported them.

And lastly, you'd better plan now for some ice fishing next year — it's the best "time machine" I've found for shortening the winter.

Care For Your Shade Trees

Now is the time to think about the care of your shade trees. Although signs of winter are still with us, the tree buds are swelling as another season of growth approaches. Shade trees are valuable, both in terms of replacement costs and their aesthetic values. As valuable assets to your property, they deserve the attention of qualified tree experts, according to the State University College of Forestry at Syracuse University.

"A large shade or ornamental tree may be impossible to replace in your lifetime," says Dr. Howard C. Miller, from the Office of Public Service and Continuing Education at the College. "And replacing with smaller trees may be very expensive. Your trees may be worth several hundred, or even thousands, of dollars."

To protect your valuable shade trees, you should see that they get regular periodic inspections and proper care by a qualified local tree expert.

The College of Forestry recommends that homeowners should take these three important steps for selecting a reliable tree expert:

1. Find out which companies have earned excellent reputations in your area by contacting the Better Business Bureau nearest you.

2. Determine whether the tree experts have professional status — such as membership in the State or National Arborists' Association, the National Shade Tree Conference, or the American Phytopathological Society.

3. Find out in advance whether the tree expert has sufficient liability insurance coverage so that your property and his employees will be adequately protected while work is in progress on your trees.

As of April 1, 1969, all commercial arborists spraying pesticides must be registered with the State Department of Agriculture and Markets. This regulation assures the property owner that only authorized pesticides will be used.

"It's better to spend a little more money for the services of a professional arborist who will do the work satisfactorily than to hire an inexperienced amateur who may damage trees," counsel the Forestry College's specialists.

ners for the school were Tom Hanbach from Grade 8 and Cindy Wallace runner-up. The Assembly was Monday afternoon with Grades 5 - 8 participating.
