Natural Orange Juice To Add Zest To Space Mission

As the Apollo 13 space craft lifted off its launching pad, something new had been added to make the voyage more palatable to the astronauts: "Natural orange juice".

Dr. Malcolm Smith, Nasa's chief of food and nutrition and a leading advocate of the use of natural foods in the Space Feeding program, made arrangements to have the orange juice crystals aboard Apollo 13, following exhaustive testing of the product in the Houston, Natick (Conn.) and Benton Harbor (Mich.) food research laboratories since 1969.

Instant orange juice is in the form of dry crystals which reconstitutes to lively-flavored, nutritious natural orange juice — indistinguishable from juice made with frozen orange juice concentrate.

For astronauts, the juice crystals are packaged in a small plastic pouch. Water is injected during flight, the pouch is then shaken a few seconds to "make" the juice.

These orange juice crystals, the result of several years' cooperative research between the Florida Citrus Commission and the U.S.D.A. Laboratory in Winter Haven, Florida, will also be included in the "pantry" of subsequent space explorations.

The fresh flavor and nutritious qualities of the new instant orange juice make it ideal not only for spacemen but also for campers, boaters and people in areas where refrigeration is not readily available — or storage space is limited.

The natural orange juice crystals are scheduled for commercial production in the near future.
