IS SANTA CLAUS FOR THE ENVIRONMENT?

Every once in a while, a guy has to put his money where his mouth is. It's easy to talk about conservation an making the environment more livable, but if something costs a little more or takes extra effort we are likely to look the other way. An oft heard excuse is, "my little bit doesn't hurt."

But it's time that all of us started on our "little bits", and we can begin with Christmas shopping.

This world of ours is going to be alot poorer if any of the hundreds of rare and endangered animals disappear forever. And before this Christmas season is over, several of these species will be rarer than before.

The alligator has received a lot of publicity in New York State, so let's take it as an example. For many years shoes, belts, handbags and other items were legally made and sold in New York, from illegal hides poached in Florida and Georgia. The whole ecology of the Everglades depends upon alligators opening up pools in the grass, and building nesting mounds. Yet for a fancy, fashionable pair of shoes, we helped bring the American alligator and the Everglades to the brink of extinction.

At long last New York passed a law against manufacturing or selling alligator products. Now the manufacturers and designers want to use foreign alligators and crocodiles. But don't be misled — all species of these large reptiles all over the world are endangered.

In the mysterious world of fashion, the rarer something is the more exclusive and fashionable it is. Now the biologists have determined that there are only 210 tigers left in the world, poachers cannot keep up with the orders for tiger skins. The biologists tell me that tigers live in well defined territories, and are known by the people who live there. So I accept what the experts say — there are only 210 left, no more.

All of the big cats are in deep trouble. Leopards, cheetahs, and jaguars are on the endangered list and furriers pay extravagant prices for them. Even the African lion, and here in this country, the mountain lion, are becoming rare.

There are a few bright spots in the picture. The owner of a New York City Shop earned a lot of good will last year by taking out a full-page advertisement saying that he would no longer handle furs or other products from rare and endangered animals. Some of the designers are using synthetic furs and leathers that can pass for the real thing.

The Women's lib movement has created an attack of its own, called "WARN". This stands for "Women Against Ravishment of Nature," and none of the members will buy or wear products made from wild animals.

What can you do about your "little bit?" This Christmas season you might try what I do. Since I cannot afford any of these items — even an alligator belt would upset our budget — I boycott the stores that sell these products. If I so much as see an alligator wallet, I hunt up the manager and tell him that he has lost my business until he stops marketing products from endangered animals.

My buying power is, indeed, a "little bit." But you'd be surprised what a few customers can do these days. This year put Santa Claus on our side.

Maple Trumpet Skeletonizer

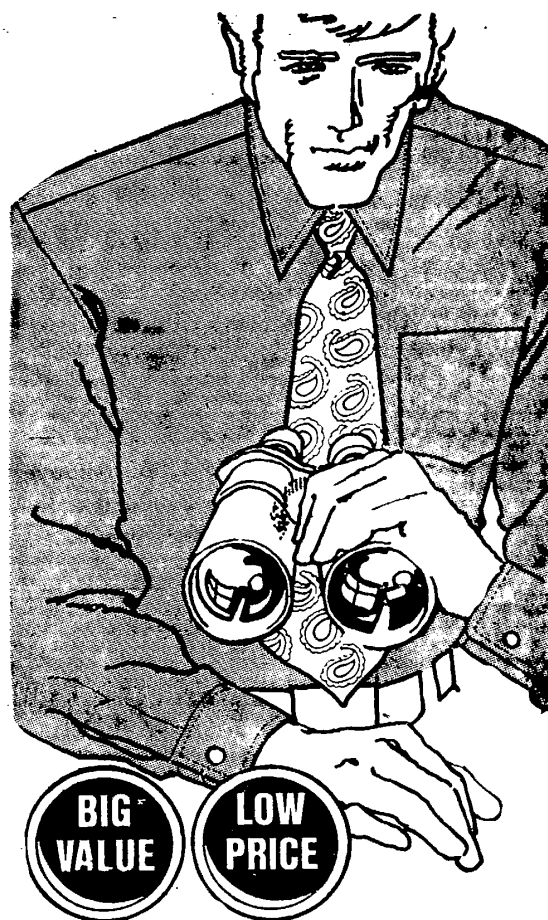

The feeding of this insect is causing the leaves of many maple trees to fold and turn greyish brown in color.

Infestation is particularly heavy in the Centerville area. Here many maple trees have practically every leaf so affected. Damage to the trees, however, is not serious since the leaves are so near their natural maturity.

This yellowish green worm is about 1/2 inch long and feeds on the underside of the leaf leaving only a lace-work of the central portion of the leaf. It forms a long slim case about itself and spins a webbing which draws the leaf into a fold.

To find one, unfold the leaf and pull the long slender case apart.

If your maples are affected by this insect this information may be reassuring.
