Brownie Girl Scouts Get New Uniform

It's hard to beat the appeal of a 7 or 8-year-old girl smiling her toothiest grin — and all dressed up in her Brownie Girl Scout uniform. But the Brownie of the future will be even more appealing — in 24 different ways.

On March 3 — just in time for Girl Scout Week — the new Brownie Girl Scout uniform will be introduced, a uniform so versatile that it will allow each girl a choice of 24 different ways to wear it.

Brownies will no longer look alike. They will have five separates to mix 'n match — an A-line jumper, blouse and tie, pants, shorts, and rib-knit tops, all in permanent press with soil-release finishes. With these, each girl can express her own individuality — dress the way she likes — and still be in official uniform. The jumper can be worn alone as a dress, or combined with the blouse, pants, shirt or top to get any one of the 12 different effects. An optional belt increases these possible combinations to 24 different looks.

More important, the new uniform's amazing versatility makes it easily adaptable to every Brownie Girl Scout activity — from running, jumping, exploring, camping and hiking to dressing up for church or synagogue in Girl Scout Week.

The new uniform is alive with color. Its bright tangerine knit top goes well with the brown pinpoint check of the new jumper and pants color. The tie is also in tangerine. And the perky white blouse has brown variegated stripes of a stylized Girl Scout trefoil design.

In the early days of Scouting only size distinguished Brownies from their older sisters. They all wore the same uniform. But in 1926, the Brownie Scout had her own brown dress complete with peaked "Pixie" hat and matching bloomers.

In 1933 the uniform became a brown cotton dress with short raglan sleeves and round collar, and a brown woolen beret alternated with the peaked hat. In 1941, the uniform became a one-piece dress of brown cotton chambray, and the brown felt beanie was introduced.

It wasn't until 1962 — the last Brownie uniform change — that a little color was introduced. This was the addition of a tangerine cotton four-in-hand tie and a tangerine embroidered Brownie emblem on the beanie. The beanie is still part of the new uniform.
