In such an affluent society as ours, it often becomes difficult to exist as a real human being.

We get up in the morning, eat a bowl of "Super Flakes" because Mark Spitz eats them, wash our face with special beauty soap because the Queen of England says it keeps her skin soft, and then put on a fancy dress hoping we will look richer than Renee next door.

It's about time this world took a humanistic rather than such a materialistic view on life. If we could only spend less time impressing people with new cars and spend more time getting to know what our neighbors are really like we would have a more beautiful world.

Why can't we see people as personalities, ideas, values and love? Is the extent of materialism in America dangerous? And why can't we try, really try to understand not only our neighbor's ideas, but the reason for these ideas as well.

CONSERVATION COMMENTS

By Paul M. Kelsey

FISH HATCHERIES - A DRASTIC NEED

Now that the biologists have a handle on lamprey control in Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, a forward-looking hatchery program is drastically needed for New York State fishermen. This is the view of William Pierce, director of the Fisheries Station operated by the NYS Department of Environmental Conservation at Cape Vincent.

Calling the fish production facilities out-dated for modern fisheries needs, Pierce outlined a drastic need for three new hatcheries.

One is needed for the production of west coast salmon. Lakes Erie and Ontario can be revitalized for sport fishermen, according to Pierce, along the lines of the upper lakes. With the lamprey control plan in full operation and proven food supplies for salmon, a fishing bonanza is in the offing.

"And this is not just for fun," Pierce reminds you, "a salmon craze like the one in Michigan would pump millions of dollars into the New York economy. The statistics and potential are already on record."

A salmon hatchery would be part of the management plan - you must stock millions of smelts each year. The west coast fish will not successfully reproduce in the Great Lakes environment. There must be constant replenishment through the artificial rearing of baby salmon.

A second hatchery is needed for modern inland fisheries management. More trout could be more efficiently produced in a new hatchery, in his estimation. And, they could be reared to larger sizes for better survivability. Both of these factors would be bonuses for today's angler trying to catch a trout in the Empire State.

A third hatchery should be built in New York State by the federal government, according to Pierce

This would be for the noble Atlantic salmon which many fear is headed for the list of endangered species. It has been driven from its spawning streams by dams and pollution for centuries, and is now over-fished in the open ocean by electronic commercial gear. Biologists in Canada, the last stronghold of the Atlantic salmon, are now discussing techniques and hatcheries that will try to save the species from extinction.

Rather than wringing our hands and crying over what many consider to be the supreme sport fish in the world, Pierce feels that an aggressive re-introduction program is in order. As pollution hopefully clears in some streams during the years ahead, the federal government needs a steady supply of Atlantic salmon to re-establish spawning runs.

But even without spawning runs, Pierce cites the Adirondack lakes where experience has shown a salmon fishery can be maintained. As the harmful pesticides are curtailed, lake trout and, perhaps, landlocked salmon would become more reality and less reminiscence.

It is refreshing to listen to Bill Pierce share his dreams. Wherein, the lower Great Lakes are revitalized for anglers and the fishing improved for giant west coast salmon ranging up to 30 pounds. Wherein, inland fishing is given a boost, rather than a handicap of operating antique facilities. Wherein, New York State anglers can experience the summit of sport fishing - the Atlantic salmon - on local waters, rather than reading about it in history books.

Bill Pierce's dreams are in the hands of New York sportsmen - we can make them come true if we care enough.
