CHIPMUNKS

We were repaid for staying off the roads over the Memorial Day weekend by our local chipmunks. It has been obvious for some time that the female, who dug her chambers under the concrete slab of our front porch, had young. Two sleek youngsters about three-quarters grown, made their first appearance in the woodpile on the front porch. They put on quite a show just outside the window as they explored the woodpile and chased each other in and out between the chunks of wood. They didn't find the feeder, just two feet from the end of the woodpile, where their mother has been dining regularly, but they did pick up just about every little loose item and check it over to see if it was worthy of putting in their mouths.

While looking out the side window at the garden work that was on my list for the day, I saw two different sized chipmunks chasing each other. Thoughts of gardening were put aside as I reached for the binoculars and settled by the window to watch them. Finally four young almost as large as their mother, were in and out of a hole in an exposed part of the yard we are redoing. They would go off six or eight feet exploring and then dart back. Finally one followed its mother over into the flower garden and disappeared. Maybe their fondness for bulbs will solve the problem of where to put all the extra plants.

All across New York the April-born first-litters of chipmunks are probably just beginning their exploring of the outside world. By the time July comes, and summer campers hit the woods, these delightful little creatures will be ready to come into camp and take your prune pits, or anything else that you may have to offer — and probably some things that you don't want to offer.

It has always fascinated campers just how much these little creatures could cram into their cheek pouches. Like many another camper, I have put out little piles of prune pits and commonly had them stow away eight or ten at one time. Others have counted over thirty kernels of whole corn or a similar number of beechnuts which would be about equal to two heaping tablespoons. The cheek pouches are outside and behind the jaws, with the content being slipped over the jaw through the gap between its sharp teeth in front, and its molars in the rear of its jaw.

Each piece of food is carefully checked and cleaned before it is wedged into place by the little hands. Items of cargo are placed first on one side, and then the other so that the load is always balanced. To empty the pouches, the chipmunk applies pressure with its hands on the outside, forcing the contents forward and out.

Where do all the goodies that they collect go? Most are taken into their main chamber or bedroom and stored under their leafy bed. When the bed has been raised all the way to the ceiling, then other underground storage chambers are brought into use. Not all food is stored for winter use. Some may be secreted around the chipmunk's territory where it can be utilized on days when a good meal cannot be found. If the weather should get too hot, they may just spend the day in their cool chamber and eat what has been brought in for storage.

Probably everyone who has watched them storing away food from an abundant supply has wondered just how much they would actually carry off. John Burroughs decided to find out, and in three days one chipmunk carried away about one bushel of hickory nuts, chestnuts and shelled corn. That seemed to be enough for after that he took no more of the offerings.

Anyone who has spent any time in the woods has heard the monotonous "chuck, chuck, chuck, chuck," repeated at a rate of about two chucks a second. Somehow this muffled song, which can go on and on, doesn't seem in character with the lively little chipmunk, so it isn't surprising that many people are starting to learn that it isn't a toad.

Most any place you go in New York where the woods are seasonably dry, the chipmunk will be there to entertain you from late March through October and into November.
