CASTING IS NOT CATCHING

Fly fishing's not difficult. Any one can learn to handle a fly rod after a few practice sessions in the backyard.

But there is more to fooling a fish than just casting — there is the catching.

For those of us who are taking their first wobbly steps in the art of fly casting, here are a few pointers.

First, you must have a leader that is absolutely free of coils and one which will sink the instant it hits the surface. To straighten a leader, pull it through a tightly clasped piece of rubber cut from a tire innertube; in a pinch, draw it across the sole of your boot. To make it sink, apply any of the commercial products made for the purpose. Graphite, available in small tubes for lubricating locks and reels, will also work.

Dress your dry flies with a silicone preparation to make them float. When flies appear bedraggled from use, they can be restored to full life by holding them over the spout of a boiling teapot.

Control your casting ambitions. Most fish are caught within a distance of 30 feet anyway. Accuracy and delicate presentation are the two most important factors in conning a fish to strike. Be very gentle in picking up the line, extremely cautious in laying it out again. This stealth not only minimizes the chances of spooking fish, but it permits the fly to land and float naturally.

Under no circumstances should the line or fly drag across the surface. It must float with the current or wind action. Sometimes a twitch will help. This means a quick, easy movement of only two or three inches.

Two last points: use a floating line with dry flies and wet flies in shallow water; use a sinking line when fishing deep and in swift currents. Generally, you'll do best using tiny midge flies or wet flies, except during hatches.

The little things in fishing make a big difference, particularly where fly tackle is concerned. That is when the casting will lead to catching!

Toughest of the top Michigan Late Model Sportsman chauffers expected to give the NASCAR boys a "try to catch me" look at the rear of his No. 84 Chevelli is Bob Sennecker of Dorr, Michigan. Young Sennecker literally "walked off" with a 100 lap ARC open Invitational at Holland International recently after having to change engines before the main event.

Other Michigan competitors expected are Rick Knotts of Kalamazoo, Art Sommers of Warren, Randy Sweet of Kalamazoo and Tom Maier of Midland.

Still the hottest point race in the charge for the Late Model Sportsman NASCAR state championship will be between West Seneca's Art Clark and Dick Flaig of Eggertsville. As of the monthly bulletin dated September 1, 1973 form NASCAR headquarters, New York

State Late Model Sportsman leader was Art Clark with 1313 points, followed closely by Dick Flaig at 1308 counters. This championship still lies in the balance as NASCAR competitors in the Late Model Sportsman division are eligible to obtain points at other tracks thru out the state for several more weeks.

The final drawing for the very, very popular Mystery Mileage car contest at both Holland and Perry Speedways will be held at Perry Motor Speedway on September 16.
