Washington, (ANF)—If you are a hard charging E-4 or E-5 type looking for promotion, here are a few things worth considering to increase your chances.

First, your Military Occupational Specialty (MOS) has considerable impact on your chances for promotion under the E-5 and E-6 semi-centralized promotion system.

To be eligible for promotion, you need a MOS score of 110, which your commander may waive to 100. Having two MOSs increases your opportunity for promotion because you can compete in either your primary or secondary MOS (SMOS). If you do not already have an SMOS, consider trying to obtain one. For this, see your personnel office or consult DA Circular 611-14 to find out what MOSs are under-strength not only in your grade but in upper grades as well.

Did you know the status of strength in each MOS for each grade affects your chances for promotion? Generally, promotions to E-5 and E-6 are allocated for specialties that are understrength. The greater the shortage, the larger the number of promotions allocated.

If you are shopping for a SMOS, one clue is to look at the monthly promotion cut-scores. The MOSs that are consistently over-strength will have extremely high cut-scores while those that are short will have low cut-scores.

Should you find yourself in an MOS which is over-strength consider voluntary reclassification into a shortage MOS. AR 600-200 establishes procedures for reclassification.

One last tip is to keep improving yourself under the 1000 point system.

Hunter Training Course Required

There is every reason to believe that more people than usual will look to the small game season as another source of food. For those who have never held a hunting license before it will mean that they must successfully complete the required four hour hunter training course given by one of some 4,000 certified instructors before they can be issued their hunting license. This increase could push the number of those taking the course this year to close to 100,000.

If you are one of these aspiring new hunters, don't put off taking this course until the last moment. Though the course is given in close cooperation with the Department of Environmental Conservation, all instructors are volunteers usually working in the name of some sporting or other organization and using their facilities to carry out the instruction. This means that courses are given when the volunteer instructors are available to teach.

Since almost all are also ardent hunters, most of the courses are set up to be completed before the opening of the small game season. New big game hunters particularly should be careful that they do not let time pass before taking this course which is also required to purchase the first big game license if no other hunting license has been held.

If you do not see the announcement of the hunter training session in your local newspaper, contact your local sportsmen's club. Your local Conservation Officer usually does not conduct courses but he is knowledgeable of things going on in the local outdoor recreation field, and may have the training schedule. He certainly can give you the names of key sportsmen in the community who could answer your inquiry.

While every hunter getting his first license must take the hunter training course, there are also some special regulations governing the use of firearms by minors. The Penal Law clearly states that it is unlawful for anyone to sell or give any firearm, air or spring gun, or ammunition thereof, to any person under the age of sixteen. There are, however, two exceptions to this.

The Penal Law permits 12-to-16 year olds to receive instruction from duly qualified adults on a regular rifle range using rifles no longer than .22 calibre rim fire. It is this authority that makes possible the firearms programs given at summer camps, schools and sportsmen's clubs.

The other exception is Section 11-0929 of the Environmental Conservation Law. This permits 14 and 15 year olds who have successfully completed their four-hour training program to obtain a hunting license. The license must be signed by the minor's parent or guardian before the issuing agent. It is valid in the field only when he is accompanied by his parent or guardian who holds a license to hunt or is accompanied by a license holder of at least 21 years of age who is designated in writing by the parent as being responsible for the minor's supervision.

Safe hunting habits are not acquired in a four-hour class. Safe practices may be learned but it takes many days in the field with careful practice before they become safe habits. The adult accompanying the young hunter should always be close enough so that he can give the proper supervision. It is not only an ideal learning situation for the minor, but is an opportunity without equal for father and son to work together and get to know each other better.

An expansion of this philosophy applies to first time big game hunters who are under 18 years of age. They cannot get their first license until they are 16, and then the first year they must hunt with someone over age 21 who has a big game license and who has had at least one year's experience hunting big game.
