How To Vacation Despite Uncertainties

Vacations have become an American way of life. In fact, a major travel organization says that 144 million Americans annually take vacation trips of 50 miles or more.

To help vacationers gain maximum travel benefits while reducing the strain on available fuels, Holiday Inn travel planners suggest the following ten travel tips:

- Check into fly-drive programs. Several airlines and motel chains offer special rates to include air fare, lodging and car rental. By doing the long part of a trip, you have more time to spend at your destination — and you still can have a car for short sightseeing trips.

- Avoid "follow-the-nose" traveling by car. Plan your trips and try not to deviate from that plan.

- Dine at or within walking distance of your accommodations rather than driving to a distant restaurant.

- Mix business with pleasure by making a convention trip double as a vacation for the whole family.

- Trains and buses offer a money-saving answer to family travel. Studies show that buses are among the most efficient users of fuel for transportation — and they cover many picturesque small towns not served by airlines.

- Many lodging chains offer free advance reservations and provide free directories for trip planning.

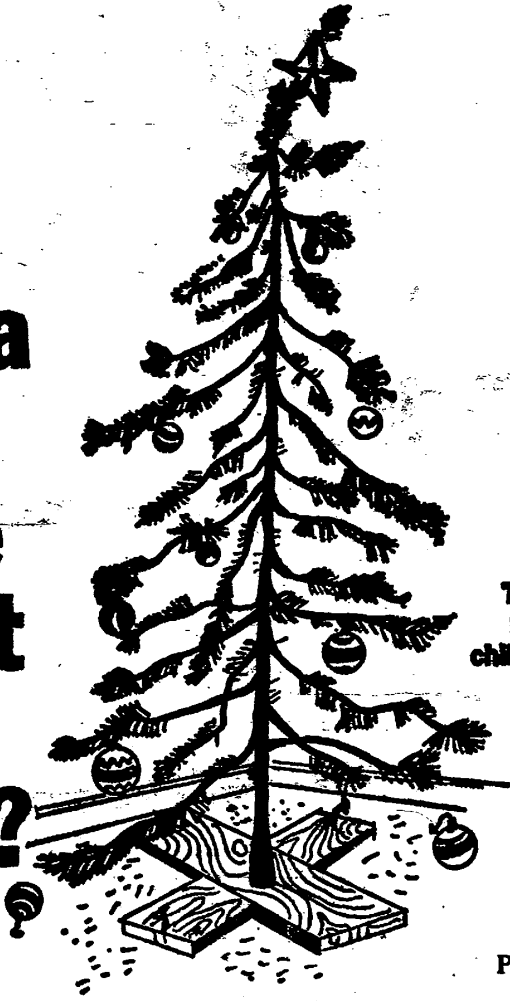

- Check into special weekend rates which may be offered by inns for "close-to-home" vacations in your home state.

- Plan your trips so that you can stop, fill the tank and find lodging by mid-afternoon.

- Don't let your gas tank get below half-full before looking for a service station.

- Work with a travel agent. Their services are free, and it's their job to be informed on the best places to visit and the best way to travel.
